J.D. Power and Associates and Yahoo! Inc. Report: Travelers Strongly Prefer Federal Involvement in Airport Security Screening Process AGOURA HILLS, Calif., Nov 19, 2001 (BUSINESS WIRE) -- As the busiest holiday travel period approaches, consumers are still planning to increase air travel. Last week's crash of Flight 587 did not dramatically reduce confidence in air travel, however, travelers want more federal involvement in security measures, according to the J.D. Power and Associates and Yahoo! Inc. (Nasdaq:YHOO) report released today. Among those who have traveled within the last three months, 62 percent of air travelers say they are "already comfortable" with air travel. This same group reports the level of travelers reporting they will "never" be comfortable rose from 3 percent to 5 percent. The report shows being "afraid to fly" is still the most often-cited reason for curtailing air travel plans, with nearly 50 percent of leisure travelers mentioning it as their number one reason. One-third of business travelers cited either economic conditions or company restrictions on air travel as their top reasons for not flying. Travelers have a strong preference for federal involvement in the airport security screening process, according to the report. "The highly publicized recent stories of security lapses have greatly reduced the public's opinion of private airport security companies," said Michael Taylor, director of travel services at J.D. Power and Associates. "The public also feels stronger that a search of checked baggage is necessary for airport security." One thing that hasn't changed in the past month is the public's faith in technology to provide greater security. High-tech scanners and bomb "sniffers" top the list of items travelers would like to see in airports. A ban on restaurant cutlery and national ID cards have the least impact on how safe consumers feel. "As for what can be done to increase in-flight security, armored cockpit doors would inspire as much confidence as sky marshals posted on random flights," said Taylor. The percentage of people that feel air travel has "changed forever" is slowly dropping, while the percentage of people perceiving "no difference" increased from 8 percent to 12 percent. The Flight 587 tragedy did not affect the percentage of travelers who are still undecided about their comfort level in flying, which remained steady at one in five travelers. The survey was conducted two months after the worst air catastrophes in the history of the United States, September 11, and one day after the crash of Flight 587. J.D. Power and Associates and Yahoo! collected data from more than 2,600 adult respondents. The public opinion poll was conducted among random visitors to Yahoo's Web site the week of November 12. More than 1,200 of the respondents reported having air travel experiences within the past three months. Headquartered in Agoura Hills, Calif., J.D.
